

SENDKIT DOCS

Reporting up: campaign results your manager can read

When a manager asks how outbound is going, the answer is three numbers scoped to one date range. Here is what to report, what to leave out, and why.

The three numbers that matter

Replies

Total responses in the reporting window. Proof the campaign is reaching real people and starting conversations.

Positive replies

Real interest, not autoresponders or polite noes. This is the north star metric, the only one worth optimizing toward.

Meetings booked

The outcome the campaign exists to produce, and the line leadership actually cares about.

Leave out: opens and clicks

A decent looking open rate paired with silence is a deliverability problem wearing a metric that looks fine.

Why open rates mislead

A large share of tracked opens are not a human reading your email at all. Mail apps pre-fetch message content in the background, which fires the open-tracking pixel whether or not anyone ever looked at the email, and those bot opens count identically to real ones in a dashboard. There is no reliable way to separate the two from the number alone.

Tracking also hurts the thing it claims to measure. An open-tracking pixel forces the email to send as HTML instead of plain text, and inbox providers flag HTML-heavy cold email faster, since spam and marketing blasts are overwhelmingly HTML. That is why SendKit does not track opens by default, and why an open rate should never headline a report.

Scope the report to the reporting window

Analytics supports date-range filtering: a specific month, a campaign's full run, or the last 7, 30, or 90 days. Pull exactly the period you are reporting on instead of working from an all-time view and doing the math yourself, so every number matches the window your manager asked about.

Reporting to client heads

Agencies presenting results to a client's leadership can send these numbers under their own brand. White-label reporting unlocks on the Pro plan ($499/mo), so reports carry your branding instead of SendKit's. Branded reports plus a dedicated account manager come with Agency ($899/mo) and Power ($2,499/mo).

THE ONE-SLIDE SUMMARY

Replies, positive replies, and meetings booked, all scoped to the same date range. If those three are healthy, the campaign is healthy, whatever the open rate says.

Pull last month's numbers

Open analytics, set the date-range filter to last month, and read off replies, positive replies, and meetings booked before your next check-in.

Open your analytics