Scale and measure: past your first campaign

Once positive replies start landing, most week-two mistakes come from watching the wrong number. Here is what actually matters as you scale past your first sequence.

Track positive reply rate, not opens

Positive reply rate, replies that show real interest, not autoresponders or a flat not interested, is the number that tells you whether your outreach is working. Check it above open rate, click rate, or raw reply count every time you review a campaign.

Why open tracking lies to you

Open tracking looks precise but is not. A large share of opens are bot opens triggered by iOS Mail privacy protection, counted whether or not a human ever saw the email. A high open rate paired with zero replies almost always means emails are landing in spam and getting auto-opened by a bot, not that people are quietly ignoring a good email. SendKit does not track opens or links, for exactly this reason: the number would tell you the opposite of the truth.

Bounce rate above 2.5 percent means revalidate

If your bounce rate on a mailbox or campaign creeps above 2.5 percent, stop and revalidate your list before sending more. A rising bounce rate is a signal about your list, not your copy, and pushing through it puts the mailbox's health score at risk right along with your sends.

When to add mailboxes

Each mailbox caps out at 15 cold emails a day, 20 once it has warmed for about two weeks. When your target daily volume outgrows what your current mailboxes can send at that cap, that is your signal to add more mailboxes, not to push a single one past its limit.

Mailbox lifespan is a function of how it is run

A mailbox run well, kept under the daily cap, healthy bounce rate, real warm-up behind it, can keep sending for 6 to 12 months or longer. Mishandled, overloaded, warm-up skipped, no revalidation, that same mailbox can burn out in a month.

THE WEEK-TWO CHECKLIST

Pull positive reply rate first, not opens. Check bounce rate against the 2.5 percent line. Confirm mailbox volume is still under the daily cap before adding leads. Then decide: hold, add mailboxes, or revalidate the list.

Set this week's scale checkpoint

Pull this week's positive reply rate and bounce rate, then decide before you launch anything new: hold, add mailboxes, or revalidate the list.
